Introduction

There is a discussion to be had on cutting your business's umbilical cord and untethering yourself from a home office location. However, if you want to do this as a digital nomad, you need to understand your technological options. You need to stay connected and collaborate with your Virtual Assistants (VAs) and/or clients. Where do you start? Let us look at the technological elements associated with a location-independent lifestyle.

1. Exploring Your Digital Options as A Nomad

For anyone who is considering a location-independent lifestyle, a way of running the business without being tied down to one place, there are various choices. We may be quite used to the structured way of establishing a home office and might be able to set one up quite intuitively. However, when it comes to a digitally nomadic style of doing business, where do you start?

The good news is that as time goes by more tools are emerging to help make it easier to do business, even if it is while traveling through an international airport or setting up at a temporary location anywhere in the world.

To be able to do business, you have to be able to communicate efficiently and effectively. While some people are open about their digital nomad lifestyle, others do not necessarily want their clients to realize that they are functioning in this way. It is possible to be as extroverted or introverted as you want. By choosing tools selectively and using them in a specific fashion to display your ultimate office efficiency and stability, you can do this without revealing that you are set up next to your favorite beachfront in the Bahamas.

The Internet has made the world a much smaller place. We can do business with others in countries thousands of miles away from us as if they were next door. So long as you always remember that professionalism and efficacy is paramount, you can use the amazing functionality of online commerce to put it all together.

No longer do you need a "hardwired" telephone line into your office. Communication tools, such as Skype, have completely rewritten the rules. You can carefully select a
